The international conference will take place in Nájera (Spain), from 8th to 10th November, 2017.

The topic of this year is about:

Exclusion and social discipline in the Medieval City in Europe

In the late Middle Ages, exclusion became a basic instrument for urban governance, as it enabled lay and ecclesiastical leaders to maintain their control over urban dwellers on the basis of maintaining a certain social discipline and an "ordered" society. Thus, medieval urban society was defined as a community of values according to the ecclesiastical and secular legislation, and it was articulated as a political discourse, which was incorporated into the public sphere. The urban community had to adapt to a legal and ideological framework and to some parameters of behavior, in which exclusion from the community was a powerful communication tool of social discipline.

The exclusion of the urban community was achieved through the separation of friends, family, job, urban governance institutions, confiscation of property, public humiliation, expulsion from the guild, proscription and the exile from the city. Repressive practices linked to the politics of fear, which took many forms, from legal punishment to social exclusion. No social group was left out of the policies of social discipline by means of exclusion. The social control of the rulers affected any person who was located outside the established parameters, whether political dissidents, foreigners, heretics, religious minorities, poor people, homeless, sick persons, categories of women or gays. The excluded people were considered common criminals, creating a world of urban marginalization. The role of the rulers, as guarantors of the common good, consisted in repressing and punishing anyone who deviated from social discipline, which was part of a gradual process of empowerment of urban elites in the late Middle Ages.

We will focus on:

1. The terminology of urban exclusion
2. The representation of exclusion in the sources
3. The instruments of exclusion
4. Political dissent
5. Poverty and social marginalization
6. Illness and exclusion
7. Gender and social exclusion
8. Religion and exclusion
9. Cultures of exclusion
10. The topography of exclusion: hospitals, suburbs and ghettos
11. The resistance of the excluded

This fascinating conference may be a good springboard to facilitate this goal.
